

Kirsten Treis: Picture "Water frogs" (2019)

€1,400.00

When it finally gets warmer in early spring and it is not too dry, the amphibians make their way to their spawning waters. If you are lucky, you will see them there in large numbers, often between already spawned egg balls. They are most likely to be spotted in the dark, often with the help of a flashlight. That's how this rather dark picture with the brightly lit frogs came about. I worked on this motif for over four years; there are five stages, all of which were once considered "completed" and some of which were even exhibited. After a final attempt in the winter of 2024, I am now really satisfied. Water frogs in a nocturnal spawning community. How beautiful! Signed and dated.
