As Lieutenant Uhura, she was the only woman on the bridge of the starship Enterprise - Nichelle Nichols. For the first time, an African-American woman played an equal role in a popular movie and did not impersonate a domestic help. When Nichelle Nichols wanted to return to the theater after the first season, Martin Luther King urged her to stay: "Don't you understand that for the first time we are being seen as we should be seen?" On board the Enterprise, Lieutenant Uhura and Captain Kirk were sizzling. Their kiss was one of the first between people of white and black skin color on US television - and caused a veritable scandal at the time. Many reasons to include Ltd Uhura in my series "Lifelines of extraordinary women". She was an inspiration for millions of African-American women. For this mixed-media work, I used acrylic paints, graphite, tissue paper and varnish.
